Software for the Notifier ID3000 Fire Alarm System. A: The software is proprietary. It's a partner of yours. If you have a problem with that software, then contact the company and see if they'll contact you with the problem. If you don't have a problem with the software, then the company is probably your only recourse. I'm not sure if/how they are keeping all their customers informed about updates and what's new and improved. Good luck. If you write a software utility, it's typically a best practice to release the source code and documentation for free. See the Free Software Foundation. If you want to do something like this, the GPL is a good license to use, and the support for it is extensive. If you don't know the GPL, you might want to take a look at the Open Source Initiative's site. You will find that the GPL is one of the core licenses, and it's a good example of a license that gives you free software while allowing others to use it under these terms. A: I'm not familiar with the panel, but as I understand it's written in C++, it has no GPL-compatible license, and has an open-source license. As such it is probably not useful to anyone but the company. The source code is probably not available, and any contributions would be more costly than the panel itself. A: Your best bet is to talk to the vendor, so you can fix the issue. This is a complex product with hundreds of thousands of units installed. Note that your question was deleted for lack of information, so I have no way to know what the problem is. McKesson Expands Partnership with DCAA McKesson has expanded its alliance with the Defense
