Getting started with Toad for Oracle SQL Developer Now that Toad for Oracle has been designed to look.Former national security adviser John Bolton has told lawmakers that a key White House adviser to President Donald Trump was "not exactly" a political ally, according to a source in the room. The stark admission from Bolton, which marked a dramatic departure from his former boss, reflects his largely private opposition to Trump in the president's Iran strategy and points to a policy divide between the White House and the former U.N. ambassador that remains open. Bolton helped lay out the administration's case for striking Iran this year, and he has repeatedly defended Trump against charges of mischaracterizing his intelligence briefings. He was also reportedly one of two GOP senators who privately told the White House that Vice President Mike Pence may need to come clean about his push to put Mike Pompeo, Trump's pick to replace fired Secretary of State Rex Tillerson, in charge of the nuclear negotiations with Tehran. Bolton said the adviser referred to was not exactly a political ally, according to the source, but more of a very close adviser. Bolton and the adviser have been at odds for some time, the source said. Asked about the comments, a National Security Council spokesperson did not immediately respond to a request for clarification. Bolton's comments on Thursday came as lawmakers returned to Capitol Hill after a three-week recess and faced questions about Trump's handling of the situation in North Korea, which has kept the U.S. from a nuclear agreement with Iran. According to the source, the adviser told Trump that a diplomatic solution was possible, and, if the president believed it was possible, they would be able to make it happen. "He said, 'Mr. President, if you think this is possible, we can get there. We can make this happen,'" the source said Bolton told Trump. "And then Donald gave him a very pointed stare and said, 'Tell me how.'" "The adviser turned red in the face," the source added. "Donald was looking straight at him and, in a not exactly nice way, he said, 'I don't need a 30-year-old kid explaining to me how to solve
