Survival, the growth of self-esteem and the commitment to the therapist: a study of terminally ill cancer patients. The purpose of this study was to investigate the effect of successful treatment for cancer on survival, patients' self-esteem and their expressed willingness to commit to the therapist. The research involved 201 patients identified as being terminally ill with cancer. One hundred and six patients had received some sort of medical treatment and 95 had not. Each was interviewed in his home by an average of 7.85 students, using the Self-Esteem Scale and a shortened version of the Wilcoxon scale of expressed willingness. Subjects whose condition was curable survived significantly longer than those whose condition was incurable (P less than 0.001). The former also enjoyed higher self-esteem ratings and were more apt to be willing to enter into a therapeutic contract than were the latter (P less than 0.001). The results for self-esteem were unchanged by the status of the subject's clinical condition, but they showed a significant interaction between treatment and self-esteem for the willingness scale. Patients with a history of medical treatment rated themselves as higher self-esteems than did their unmedicated counterparts. The findings were discussed in terms of the current need for a clear understanding of the impact of cancer on the patient's self-evaluation and motivation in a therapeutic relationship.and i decided to learn and apply the naval flotilla and munition handoff and so I did! after some research on the internet about the handoff rule, i put together a scale model military flotilla of ships. they are very awesomely detailed and painted. i have been submitting my work on deviantart and at the moment i started a new project which is a chronological timeline of the "tanks of the oceans".
