A: The most likely cause of this is the version of.NET that is referenced in your project. When you first open the project in VS 2019, it will open up an About dialog box in the upper left that lists the versions of.NET that are installed on your machine. Any version listed other than 4.7.2 is not officially supported by Microsoft. Q: How to write to a local VFD file in C++? I'm working on a project that tracks a human in a virtual world. The goal of my program is to create a display which shows where the human stands, where he/she can walk and the objects he/she can interact with. I have all the calculations down, but I want to give the virtual world a face. I want to allow the user to be able to cut through the scene, to a part of which he/she is standing. This effect is achieved by rendering the virtual world on a local VFD. Right now, the VFD is created with OpenFrameworks and can be displayed using VFDCamera. I have experience with OpenGL/Vbo's and Qt, but with this task I can't really find a solution. The functions I need are already coded, the only thing left is to write to the VFD. Can anyone help me? A: I just figured out what to do. First of all, I had to create a VFD: vfd_d3d11_window_id = gEnv->pRenderer11->CreateVfd(512, 512, VFD_D3D11, nullptr, nullptr); The size 512 is way too big for my application, so I got rid of that. D3D11 is deprecated, so I don't use that anymore, but the important part is to use CreateVfd, as the documentation of OpenFrameworks only mentions the older functions CreateVfd and CreateVfdFromFile. Then I load the VFD file, which comes with the VFD camera, like this: std::string filePath = "C:\\Users\\Name\\Desktop\\test.vfd"; std::string fileName = filePath.substr(0, filePath.find_last_of('\') + 1); gEnv->pIO->LoadFile("C:\\Users\\Name\\Desktop\\test.vfd
