The purpose of this study was to examine the effects of other-race face presentation on self-identified Black subjects. The effect was examined under different contexts. The experiment was performed in a 3 (group: self-identity, same-race, other-race) x 2 (context: avoidance, approach) x 3 (trial type: go/no-go) design, in which one type of context and condition was randomly selected for each block. The study revealed that the other-race face task facilitated the overall performance in the Black self-identity group. Also, in the Black same-race and other-race groups, the other-race face effect was consistently observed even in the avoidance context and under certain conditions. The data suggest that similar to Whites, the facilitation effect occurs in Black subjects. Overall, the facilitation effects were observed only when the Black subjects were exposed to a Black other-race stimulus and were not observed when they were exposed to a White other-race stimulus.www.facebook.com/Aquaberry Aquaberry Theme by: Designed for: Facebook App,Tumblr App and many others!
